Deception and DiscoveryVon Helen HancoxThis was an enjoyable story about a man who returns from India (where he was reported as dead) to discover he appears to have a wife - but he knows he didn't marry Emily. Captain Matthew Leland's unexpected return gives great joy to his family - but he's more interested in knowing what Emily - his purported wife - is planning. He pretends to have amnesia, thus not to remember her, to give himself space to discover more about her and her motivations.Despite the deception that both are involved in, they begin to create something of a life together. When their trust is tested, can they believe enough in each other, despite the lies, to make a future? This was an enjoyable read with appealing main characters. There were some flaws in the book - I felt that the blackmail subplot didn't work entirely well, and that the occasional focus on sister Susanna and Matthew's parents wasn't entirely successful - but overall it was a good read and an uplifting one. It was good to read of people who, despite having every reason to turn against each other, are able to forgive and forget and move on. Buchrückseite The prodigal return . . . It's an absolute scandal when Captain Matthew Leland arrives at Madingley Court. Presumed dead in battle, his sudden appearance gives the ton quite the shock. But no one is more surprised than Matthew, because waiting for him at home is a bewitching, blue-eyed beauty and she claims to be his wife! Miss Emily Grey was alone in the world when a knight in shining armor came to her rescue, claimed her heart, and then disappeared. But now her little white lie, a desperate act of self-preservation, has come back to haunt her. Her husband, once a far-off fantasy, is now a flesh-and-blood man who insists she share his bed . . . Matthew has no memory of any marriage to this scheming seductress, and he's determined to expose her in every way. But a life with the exquisite Emily will prove irresistible . . . and a marriage of deception will become a marriage of sweet, sweet surrender.
