Its a nice short story for in between two books if you are looking for something light, that doesnt rattle you too much emotionally.I loved the whole set-up with the message board sure, it doesnt sound realistic and who writes whole letters and pins them on a board but honestly, I can see that happen. In the mass of information they are only relevant for those they concern. So it was no problem for me.The built-up was good,

the characters all very likeable, even the ex-boyfriend. I wasn't sure who Mr. X would be just that one definitely wasn't. But I liked the end-result very much and I liked the chemistry I could feel. I admit that a short story very seldom gets full 5 stars from me - to be amazing it must be really intense. This one is cute and definitely goes on my list of "comfort rereads". 0 von 0 Kunden fanden die folgende Rezension hilfreich. Cute but nothing more. Von Ida I actually expected way more from this short story than what I got, even though this is "just" a short story. The set up seemed really cute, with the notes and the whole "trying to find out who Mr. X is" but the same time, everything was also kinda awkward and unrealistic for me - the conversations were too stoic and straight to the point, the characters definitely interesting, but not really developed and especially Jacob was lacking so much as the MC compared to the three Mr. X candidates and his ex he felt bland and boring until the very end. I did enjoy how the romance played out and the interactions were definitely cute, so three stars for that, but story and writing style wise I wasn't really impressed. A cute little read, but don't expect much from it.

Kurzbeschreibung Jacobs in a pickle. He needs a new flatmate, and soon. And what better way to advertise than on the noticeboards around campus? Trouble is, someone is taking down his ads. Jacob writes to the offending thief, little expecting to be answered and soon he finds himself in a deeper pickle: who is this Mr. X that he keeps writing to? And how can Jacob be falling for him?
