Von Starhawk : The Fifth Sacred Thing before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised The Fifth Sacred Thing:

A good read but for a cynic...Von Ein KundeI admit, I wouldn't have picked up the book if I'd realised Starhawk was the name of the author, not part of the title. But I like Zimmer Bradley, and the blurb was good.I enjoyed reading The Fifth Sacred Thing. It was a well-thought out, realized world - though only San Francisco was truly vivid. Maya, Madrone and Bird are great characters and none of the spiritual/magical explanations were added on; everything was tied into the plot. However, based on all these reviews, I'd say read The Fifth Sacred Thing if you do believe in wicca, in ley lines and crystals. If you don't, like me, you'll find a well written, enjoyable but in the end - too much Californian sunshine solving every problem, peace and love win, the big bad Corporation and Army defeated. The book is a little too much political fantasy without enough reality. The Wild Boar people are happy to stay away from the water and food-rich City? The Corporation only drugs their pen-raised soldiers with immune-enhancers not serious drugs? And the only bad apple in the entire place seems to be Cress rabbiting on. Read it, but go for harder stuff if you're cynical like me. If you're not, well, you're much happier than me, and you'll enjoy the book a lot. 3 von 3 Kunden fanden die folgende Rezension hilfreich. Absolutely Terrible Von Ein Kunde This book is the most trite piece of literature I have ever read. It is over simplified and SO politically correct that it makes one sick to read it. Unless you are forced to, don't waste your time reading this book. 1 von 1 Kunden fanden die folgende Rezension hilfreich. A Bit Preachy, However ... Von R. D. Roberts Starhawk does paint a picture of that which may lie within. Like Thea Alexander in "2150 AD," Heinlein in "Stranger in a Strange Land" and even Walsch's "Conversations With God," she points to a love that probably exists in our core. This love is masked by our genes' survival need. Two of the genes' best survival strategies are jealousy and greed. Starhawk and the other writers mentioned make one wonder whether individual genetic survival, and hence jealousy and greed, are indeed the best survival strategies in a world full, some would say too full, of people.
